

When I was young I lived in a city that was mean and hard and ugly. Its streets were dry as dust, cracked by heat and cold, and never blessed with rain. A gritty, yellow wind blew constantly, scratching round the buildings like a hungry dog.

The people had grown as mean and hard and ugly as their city, and I was mean and hard and ugly too.

I lived by stealing from those who had almost as little as I did.

My heart was as shrivelled as the dead trees in the park.

I met an old lady down a dark street.

She was frail and alone, an easy victim.

Her bag was fat and full,

but when I tried to snatch it from her,

she held on with the strength of heroes.

To and fro we pulled that bag until at last she said,
"If you promise to plant them, I'll let go."

What did she mean? I didn't know or care,

I just wanted the bag, so I said,

"All right, I promise."

She loosened her grip at once and smiled at me.

I forgot the food and money.

And for the first time in my life I felt lucky,
rich beyond my wildest dreams.

I slept with the acorns for my pillow, my head full of leafy visions.

And in the morning I began to keep my promise
